How Jerseys are Born

Tonight, the Condors are wearing jerseys highlighting the upcoming ECHL All-Star Classic to be held right here at Rabobank Arena on January 26th. Designing a jersey is no simple task, but the Condors have a couple members on their staff who aren't rookies at designing jerseys.

Equipment manager John Doolan has been around hockey for a long time, and he served as the equipment manager for the Pittsburgh Penguins of the NHL for a period of time as well. While with the Penguins, Doolan helped to design a few different jerseys that were worn by the club.

The Penguins current gold and black themed jerseys were not always the team colors. The first jerseys worn by the organization were blue, and had "Pittsburgh" written diagonally from the right shoulder to the left hip. By 1968, the jerseys began to feature the familiar yellow triangle behind the penguin. Said Doolan, "That symbol stands for the three rivers coming together in Pittsburgh."

You might also say Doolan is also partially responsible for the invention of third jerseys in the NHL. In the early 1980's, the Penguins donned the yellow and black for the first time. "We wanted to be able to match up with other Pittsburgh sports teams," claimed Doolan. Both the Steelers of the NFL and the Pirates of MLB boast a yellow and black theme, and the Penguins joined them mid-way through the season. "We brought them out for the first time about half-way through the season. All the players were wondering why they had black gloves, and I told them not to worry about it. We did a good job keeping it secret, even the players didn't know what was going on."

Doolan also has the gratitude of hockey broadcasters everywhere for another jersey adjustment. "I helped get numbers put on the shoulders of players' jerseys instead of having them closer to the elbows. It made it a lot easier for people to see who was who, especially the TV and radio guys."

Condors President Matthew Riley has also helped teams design jerseys. "I've had input in logos for a number of teams, including the Condors, as well as the logos for this year's All-Star Classic," said Riley. But it doesn't stop there. The Condors wear multiple special jerseys every year, and Riley always has a say with those, too. "I have a lot of input obviously in all the specialty jerseys we do as well as our standard game jerseys throughout the years." He brought experience earned in baseball before coming to the Condors as well. "I also designed the Chattanooga Lookouts, Mobile BaySharks and Mobile BayBears uniforms when I was with those teams."

But what about the All-Star Classic jerseys? Their design was an effort of collaboration with the league office. "The process started back in March and we finalized it in July," explained Riley. "We looked at the patterns of the Chicago Blackhawks, Pittsburgh Penguins, L.A. Kings and Anaheim Ducks, because those are popular NHL teams with cool uniforms. We finally decided on the basic Kings pattern, with a few tweaks, such as adding the laces on the collar."

There are many ways in which jerseys have evolved over time. Tell us your favorite team jersey, let us know at www.facebook.com/bakersfieldcondors.
